Slavery, and the prejudice it fostered, remains the central tragedy of American history. How could it be that a nation founded on human equality was also home to one of the harshest labor systems the modern world has known? This exhibition looks for answers in the progress of Abraham Lincoln towards a higher realization of America's ideals. Lincoln hated slavery. Yet he did not support immediate emancipation. Lincoln became the great emancipator only when he and his nation were recast in the crucible of war.
